Army of helpers

By DAVID SINCLAIR

When people talk about the Nike-Vancouver International Marathon, one thing they always mention is the organization.

Regardless of what the weatherman may do to the race and runners, athletes from around the world have put Vancouver's organization on par with Boston, New York and London.

They say that even though the race is smaller in size, the calibre of the volunteers and the manner in which the race is directed makes this event as good as any marathon, anywhere.

This is no accident. For though May 6th is the culmination of months of training by thousands of runners, it is also the climax to months of work by a volunteer committee of 12 and a key group of 20 additional volunteers. And for most of this core of 32, this marks the third year they've worked together.

The committee meets year 'round. They are already working on 1985 and 1986, and have been for several months. The additional group of 20 join with the committee in January of every year. From that time onward, this group of 32 works as one body with the single purpose of putting on the perfect race.

In order to meet that end, this key group of 20 have to find almost 700 other volunteers for the weekend of the race. Volunteers to haul equipment around the course, set up and man aid stations, sponge stations, exhibition booths. Volunteers to be course marshalls, drive support vehicles, man an extensive communications network and clean up after the runners.

And the finish line is a world unto itself. It is manned by an army of specialists. There is no room for error here. There are timers with support staff and an experienced group from registration feverishly working to produce results for the awards ceremony.

DON BASHAM,
Race Director

Volunteer award

By DAVID SINCLAIR

One award went largely unnoticed at this year's Nike-Vancouver International Marathon. The very first Volunteer of the Year award was presented to Neil Wakelin, technical director of the race.

The job of a race technical director is to physically lay out, measure, mark and in Neil's case, certify the race course. So when the marathon committee decided to abandon the old course, it was Neil's job to come up with a new one.

"I started at it straight away," says Wakelin. "Immediately following last year's race. You start out by looking at a map, you're not actually out there riding."

He started by trying to find a two loop course, using as much of the old course as possible. That proved to be impossible. As he points out, "Even the long way around the park wouldn't get us close to 13.1 miles. So rather than run around the stadium a couple of times, Don (Basham) and I decided to add the False Creek loop."

Eventually, he came up with three possible courses. The next step was to drive around them by car. This way he was able to observe the lay of the land and the condition of the roads as he got a ball-park figure as to the actual length of each course.

The rest of the work would be done on bicycle. Each course had to be ridden to get an exact distance. Before each ride, the bicycle had to be calibrated on a surveyed, one kilometre course on Sperling Avenue.

Once parks board, city engineering, Vancouver police and marathon officials put their heads together and agreed on the course that suited all factions, Neil's work started in earnest. For a period covering three months, November '83 through February '84, he rode section after section of the course. Fine tuning and adjusting each segment until he came up with exactly the right distance.

Then, the end of February, came the big day. By this time, Wakelin had ridden sections of the course dozens of times. And he had ridden the entire course, start to finish, four times. Each ride had been preceded by a visit to the calibration course. This day would be no different. Only today, he wouldn't be alone.

On this day, he would be joined by a representative of A.I.M.S., the Association of International Marathons; and, by a member of B.C.'s Road Racing Committee, Bill Noel, assistant technical director of the New York City Marathon, was the AIMS rep; and, Wayne Fisher came from the road racing committee.

They started by certifying the calibration course. This was done by measuring the course with a 100' steel tape being held at exactly 10 pounds pressure. To make sure, the course was measured in both directions. It proved to be 1/4 of an inch long. So far, so good.

Next, they rode the calibration course four times and took the mean average of the distance displayed on their individual counters. Then it was off to the marathon course.

As they went, the three constantly compared readings with each other. Neil laid down the final markings at each mile and at every 5 km, as they went. And as they reached the finish line, he could finally breath a sigh of relief and smile. The course was bang on! It was certified.

To be able to ride the course as the runner would run it — cutting corners etc. — Neil had to get up before the sun. He had to reach the course before the traffic started. And he figures he had to do at least half of the riding completely alone. Although this made the job more difficult, it was not the hardest part of the job.

"The toughest part of the job," says Wakelin, "was not being able to ride the course backwards. Usually you start from the finish line and ride toward the start. But I couldn't do that on this course...can you imagine trying to ride the wrong way on the Georgia Viaduct?"

As Don Basham made the presentation he talked about the award being a symbolic 'thankyou' to every volunteer involved with the race. If the award is a symbol of gratitude, then Neil Wakelin is a symbol of the hard work and dedication needed to put on a successful race. None worked harder, and no one is more deserving of the award.

The taste keeps coming through.

Blue smiles along with you.
